

After more-than three-decades of success... local resident starts over.

For more than thirty-five years Chris Power-Gomez has led creative programs for some of the most successful businesses in the world. A unique combination of classical training and entrepreneurial experience at start-ups and F500 companies – he transformed ideas into multimillion-dollar revenue streams.

While working at Metro Media Television, where he interned while studying at UCLA, he was instrumental in creating what is now television syndication. He had a mind that went beyond his creative abilities. From television Chris spent more than a decade developing brands and marketing for major motion pictures – he was the youngest Art director of Releasing for MGM/UA, and Cannon Films. He was recognized for his show title 'Runaway Train, with an Academy Award nomination.

He was a pioneer at successfully bringing Broadway Theater to LA., when it was believed that the L.A. market wouldn't accept it. His proof was his success with La Cage Aux Folles, Cats, Evita, 42nd street and more. He also had a stint in retail, as (again the youngest) Art Director of Visual Merchandising for the May Company's thirty-six stores.

Chris then went corporate, working with several global advertising firms in the Wilshire Corridor. He spent nearly two-decades developing, implementing and managing brands and marketing on wide ranging National and Fortune 5 accounts. He was responsible for branding, marketing and market entrance on some of the most successful brands in the world, many are now a household name as a result.

Chris' life was drastically changed on September 30, 2010. As a pedestrian in a crosswalk in 'The Village' (Westlake Village), he was hit by a bus traveling at more than 35 mph. Thought deceased after finally landing some 40 feet down the road, Mr. Power-Gomez was in a coma for some time.

He awoke, family by his side with only fragmented memory of his life. Left with many physical limitations from injury, and TBI (Traumatic Brain Injury) - he began a two-year journey to come back to life. Having to relearn the basics - from walking and talking, to breathing and swallowing; he surprised the medical community with an astounding recovery. With an unyielding drive to become the man... the husband and father he once was, he worked to rebuild himself physiologically and neurologically, personally and professionally.

Seven-years after the accident, Chris lives in Thousand Oak with his Wife of thirty-years, his son and daughter. He's healthy and works every day to offset the effects of TBI. He's created a baseball enterprise with his son that is thriving. He recently created and launched a lifestyles magazine related to his passion, cars, which is catching-steam. Chris has one-more milestone to complete his recovery - re-entering his profession. The Final Chapter.

This week, Chris Power-Gomez launches his start-up professional services firm, Power-Gomez Brand Marketing.
